Recent Publications on the History of Mining/64

Compiled by Lysa Wegman-French

Front Cover: A contractor for the Environmental Protection Agency conducts streambed remediation at the Commodore Mine, Creede, Colorado. The uppermost structures are on the mine's three level, the middle structures are on the four level, and the lower cribbing with the mine dump is on the five level, which was worked through an adit out of view behind the dump called the Commodore Tunnel. Barely visible on the hillside to the left of the dump is the collapsed portal of the Nelson Tunnel. The large structure to the right of the road is the ore house and loading chutes for the Commodore Mine.

Back Cover: Members of the Mining History Association examine the mill built to process ore from the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company's Fluorspar Mine at Wagon Wheel Gap, Colorado. This property was one of CF&I's more important sources of fluxing fluorspar for its steel operations in Pueblo during the early years of the twentieth century. (Editor's photos.)
